There has been growing interest in the implications of evidence-based nursing care on patient outcomes, which are essential in highlighting the value of nursing care (Blegen et al., 2011; Dubois et al., 2013; Needleman et al., 2007; Patrician et al., 2010). The demand for efficiency in health care has led to significant and frequent changes, such as the restructuring of hospital care through staffing strategies (Duffield et al., 2007; Kane et al., 2007; Montalvo, 2007). Nursing Sensitive Indicators (NSIs) are critical measures that reflect the quality and impact of nursing care on patient outcomes. In the high-acuity environment of critical care units, these indicators serve as essential tools for evaluating clinical performance, improving patient safety, and guiding nursing practice. Nursing Sensitive Indicators (NSIs) are critical metrics that reflect the structure, process, and outcomes of nursing care. In critical care settings—where patient acuity is high and the margin for error minimal—NSIs serve as essential tools to assess and improve nursing quality, safety, and patient outcomes. This session explores the relevance, application, and impact of NSIs within intensive care units (ICUs), focusing on key indicators such as pressure injuries, catheter-associated infections, falls, and nurse staffing levels. Through evidence-based insights and real-world case examples, the presentation will examine how critical care teams can utilize NSIs to inform practice, guide decision-making, and support continuous quality improvement. Special emphasis will be placed on integrating NSIs into clinical audits, quality dashboards, and accreditation frameworks, thereby aligning frontline nursing care with institutional goals for excellence and patient safety. Additionally, the talk will highlight challenges in data collection and reporting, while proposing practical strategies for fostering a culture of accountability and data-driven. Nursing Sensitive Indicators, Critical Care, ICU, Quality Improvement, Patient Safety, Nursing Outcomes, Clinical Governance
